

An hourglass graphic with a globe in the top bulb and another globe in the bottom bulb. The top bulb is dark blue, and the bottom bulb is light blue. The hourglass is light gray. The globe in the top bulb is dark blue, and the globe in the bottom bulb is light blue. The hourglass is centered on the page.

WikiLeaks Document Release

<http://wikileaks.org/wiki/CRS-RL30842>

February 2, 2009

Congressional Research Service

Report RL30842

THE VICE PRESIDENCY: EVOLUTION OF THE MODERN OFFICE, 1933-2001

Harold C. Relyea, Government and Finance Division

Updated February 13, 2001

Abstract. This report reviews the evolution of the modern vice presidency—the historical events and developments that have contributed to the expansion of the office beyond its largely legislative branch character to include diverse and important executive branch duties.

WikiLeaks

CRS Report for Congress

Received through the CRS Web

The Vice Presidency: Evolution of the Modern Office, 1933-2001

February 13, 2001

Harold C. Relyea
Specialist in American National Government
Government and Finance Division

<http://wikileaks.org/wiki/CRS-RL30842>

The Vice Presidency: Evolution of the Modern Office, 1933-2001

Summary

Something of an afterthought, the vice presidential office came to the attention of the delegates to the constitutional convention in the closing days of their deliberations in 1787. The Vice President's constitutional mandate vested him with two responsibilities: presiding over the deliberations of the Senate and standing by to succeed to the presidency in the event of the incumbent's death. For the next 140 years, those holding the vice presidential office served only these functions. Indeed, the Vice President soon came to be regarded as a legislative branch official. However, for six incumbents during this period, their service was particularly important to the nation when they succeeded to the presidency.

Although some Vice Presidents informally provided advice to the Presidents with whom they served, the inclusion of the Vice President in Cabinet deliberations did not occur until the second decade of the 20th century. Consequently, Cabinet members usually were more and better informed about the policies and practices of an administration than the man who might be required to lead that administration in the event of the President's death. Woodrow Wilson fractured the precedent in 1919 when he requested his Vice President to preside over a few Cabinet meetings while he was in France negotiating the treaty of peace concluding World War I. Thereafter, President Warren Harding regularly included his Vice President in Cabinet sessions, and with the presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the practice became tradition. Moreover, President Roosevelt began to make other uses of the Vice President as an arm of the presidency, launching the modern version of this office.

This report reviews the evolution of the modern vice presidency—the historical events and developments that have contributed to the expansion of the office beyond its largely legislative branch character to include diverse and important executive branch duties. It will be updated as changing conditions and circumstances recommend.

Contents

Expanded Responsibilities	1
John N. Garner	2
Henry A. Wallace	3
Harry S. Truman	4
Alben W. Barkley	5
Richard M. Nixon	6
Lyndon B. Johnson	6
Hubert H. Humphrey	7
Spiro T. Agnew	8
Gerald R. Ford	10
Nelson A. Rockefeller	12
Walter F. Mondale	13
George H. W. Bush	14
Danforth Quayle	16
Albert Gore, Jr.	17
Richard B. Cheney	19
Appendix 1: Presidents and Vice Presidents of the United States	21
Appendix 2: Institutionalization of the Vice President's Executive Office	24

The Vice Presidency: Evolution of the Modern Office, 1933-2001

Something of an afterthought, the vice presidential office came to the attention of the delegates to the constitutional convention in the closing days of their deliberations in 1787. The Vice President's constitutional mandate vested him with two responsibilities: presiding over the deliberations of the Senate and standing by to succeed to the presidency in the event of the incumbent's death. For the next 140 years, those holding the vice presidential office served only these functions. Indeed, the Vice President soon came to be regarded as a legislative branch official. However, for six incumbents during this period, their service was particularly important to the nation when they succeeded to the presidency. They included John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Andrew Johnson, Chester A. Arthur, Theodore Roosevelt, and Calvin Coolidge.

Although some Vice Presidents informally provided advice to the Presidents with whom they served, the inclusion of the Vice President in Cabinet deliberations did not occur until the second decade of the 20th century. Consequently, Cabinet members usually were more and better informed about the policies and practices of an administration than the man who might be required to lead that administration in the event of the President's death. Woodrow Wilson fractured the precedent in 1919 when he requested Vice President Thomas R. Marshall to preside over a few Cabinet meetings while he was in France negotiating the treaty of peace concluding World War I. Thereafter, President Warren G. Harding regularly included Vice President Calvin Coolidge in Cabinet sessions. Elected to the presidency in 1924, Coolidge invited Vice President Charles G. Dawes to Cabinet meetings, but he declined. During the tenure of Herbert C. Hoover, Vice President Charles Curtis only occasionally attended Cabinet deliberations. With the presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt, however, the practice of including the Vice President in the Cabinet became tradition. Moreover, President Roosevelt began to make other uses of Vice President John N. Garner as an arm of the presidency, launching the modern version of this office.¹

Expanded Responsibilities

During the latter half of the 19th century, broader thinking about other roles the Vice President might play began to be evidenced. When Congress chartered the Smithsonian Institution in 1846, the Vice President was statutorily designated a member of its Board of Regents.² Various editions of the Congressional Directory, the official almanac of Congress, reveal that James S. Sherman served as chairman of the congressional Commission on Enlarging the Capitol Grounds in 1911; Thomas R. Marshall was a member of the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission from 1914 to 1921, succeeded by Calvin Coolidge during 1921-1923, Charles G. Dawes during 1925-1929, Charles Curtis during 1929-1933, and John N. Garner during the final months of 1933. Similarly, Dawes became a member of the congressional Commission on Enlarging the Capitol Grounds in 1925, and was succeeded by Curtis, who chaired the panel, and Garner, who also chaired. In addition, beginning in 1925, Dawes, Curtis, and Garner were successively ex officio members of the Commission for the Celebration of the 200th Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington.

¹Appendix 1 of this report identifies those individuals who held the position of Vice President and the Presidents with whom they served.

John N. Garner

A veteran of the legislature, John N. Garner came to the vice presidency on March 4, 1933, when he was 64 years old. A lawyer by training, he served as a judge in Uvalde County, Texas, during 1893-1896; moved on to the Texas House of Representatives in 1898; and then to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1903, where he served for the next 30 years. He was chosen House minority leader in 1928, and was elected Speaker in 1931. A life-long Democrat, Garner has been described as a Jeffersonian, a man who thought that “we have too many laws,” and who believed in limited government—confined to protecting the lives and property rights of citizens.³ He enjoyed the support of newspaper magnate William Randolph Hearst as a presidential candidate in 1932, and won the California primary contest in May. Placed in nomination at the Democratic national convention in Chicago in June, Garner found himself locked in a stalemate with Franklin D. Roosevelt and two other rivals. Breaking the deadlock, Hearst prevailed upon Garner, who was in Washington, to release his delegates to Roosevelt. In doing so, Garner gained sufficient favor with FDR that he was selected as his running mate.⁴ For many, Garner was viewed as a counterweight to the progressive, internationalist Roosevelt. He subsequently found himself in opposition to the administration’s deficit spending policy, attempt to enlarge the composition of the Supreme Court, and some New Deal legislative initiatives. He was also among those in his party who opposed a third term for President Roosevelt.

Like his predecessors, Garner, as Vice President, maintained offices on Capitol Hill, but he did not regard himself as primarily a legislative officer. He regularly attended and actively participated in Cabinet meetings, often advised the President, and, particularly during the early years of the New Deal, often provided liaison to Congress. Although the Vice President was not among those formally designated to attend the deliberations of the emergency coordinating councils successively created ² 9 Stat. 102.

³ Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., The Crisis of the Old Order, 1919-1933 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1957), p. 228.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 307-309.

by the President,⁵ there is evidence that Garner was welcomed to, and did attend, a few meetings of the National Emergency Council.⁶ In 1935, after traveling with a congressional delegation—the first instance of a Vice President going abroad—for the installation of Manuel Quezon as the president of the Philippine Islands and to Japan to visit Emperor Hirohito, Garner undertook a foreign assignment for FDR, journeying to Mexico.⁷

Henry A. Wallace

Twenty years younger than Garner, Henry A. Wallace, trained in agricultural science, successor to his father as the editor of his family's farm magazine, and a former Republican, became an active supporter of FDR in 1932. He joined the Roosevelt Administration as Secretary of Agriculture in 1933, remaining in that position until September 1940, when he resigned to accept the Democratic nomination for Vice President. Serving the entirety of Roosevelt's third term, Wallace found his presidential ambitions stymied by FDR's decision to seek reelection in 1944. Furthermore, Wallace's liberal, internationalist views had produced strong opposition among party leaders to his renomination as Roosevelt's vice presidential running mate. Three months after his vice presidential term ended, he was nominated to be Secretary of Commerce, a position he held until September 1946, when President Harry S. Truman asked him to resign because of a speech attacking the administration's foreign policy toward the Soviet Union.

FDR selected Wallace to join him on the Democratic ticket in 1940 largely because he wanted a Vice President who was an internationalist, aware of world conditions, and especially alert to the menace of Nazism. War had begun in Europe in September 1939, but the United States remained officially neutral, even though American weaponry was being sold to Great Britain and France. Vice President Wallace could express critical views about the actions of Germany and Italy that the President, in view of official neutrality policy, could not. Shortly after the election, Roosevelt dispatched the Spanish-speaking Wallace to Mexico as his representative at the presidential inauguration of Avila Camacho, a move designed to gain Mexican support for Pan-Americanism and hemispheric defense.⁸ Later, in 1943, Wallace

⁵ These were the Executive Council, created by E.O. 6202-A of July 11, 1933; the National Emergency Council, established by E.O. 6433-A of Nov. 17, 1933; and the reconstituted National Emergency Council mandated by E.O. 6889-A of Oct. 29, 1934.

⁶ These include the meetings of Jan. 23, 1934; Jan. 8 and Feb. 5, 1935; and Jan. 28, 1936. See Lester G. Seligman and Elmer E. Cornwell, Jr., eds., New Deal Mosaic: Roosevelt Confers with His National Emergency Council, 1933-1936 (Eugene, OR: University of Oregon Books, 1965), pp. 48, 68-69, 76, 400, 425, 426, 432-434, 437, 439-440, 502, 507, 516-517, 521.

⁷ Irving G. Williams, The Rise of the Vice Presidency (Washington, DC: Public Affairs, 1956), pp. 161-162.

⁸ Ibid., pp. 182-183.

made a goodwill tour of Latin America.⁹ The following year, he served as FDR's emissary to Soviet Siberia and China.¹⁰

When the President established the Economic Defense Board (later known as the Board of Economic Warfare) in July 1941, "for the purpose of developing and coordinating policies, plans, and programs designed to protect and strengthen the international economic relations of the United States in the interest of national defense," Wallace was made its chairman.¹¹ Shortly thereafter, he was made chairman of a related defense coordination entity, the Supply Priorities and Allocations Board.¹² In October 1941, Wallace joined Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, Army Chief of Staff George C. Marshall, presidential science adviser Vannevar Bush, and Harvard University president James B. Conant as a member of the President's policy committee on the development and use of atomic energy.¹³ A few weeks later, after the attack on Pearl Harbor, Wallace "alone attended both of the conferences President Roosevelt held that Sunday evening with the Cabinet and legislative leaders."¹⁴

Harry S. Truman

A farmer, World War I veteran, small businessman, and county judge in his home state of Missouri, Harry S. Truman was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1934 and served there until 1945 when he took the vice presidential oath. As a Senator, he came to be known as a man of personal integrity, a reputation that grew as a result of his chairmanship of the Senate Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program. The panel's various inquiries and remedial recommendations resulted in many economies and better equipment and conditions for armed services personnel.¹⁵ President Roosevelt selected Truman as his 1944 running mate after strong opposition developed among some party leaders regarding the renomination of Vice President Henry A. Wallace. In an ironic twist, Truman helped secure Senate approval of his predecessor's appointment to be Secretary of Commerce in 1945. After serving only 82 days as Vice President, Truman suddenly found himself elevated to the presidency when FDR died on April 12, 1945. During his brief vice presidential tenure, Truman had been told very little by the very ill and very preoccupied President—American development of the atomic bomb being one of the more important nonadmissions.¹⁶

⁹ Michael Dorman, The Second Man (New York: Delacorte, 1968), p. 155.

¹⁰ Williams, The Rise of the Vice Presidency, pp. 202-204.

¹¹ See E.O. 8839, 3 C.F.R., 1938-1943 Comp., pp. 972-973; Dorman, The Second Man, pp. 152-155; Williams, The Rise of the Vice Presidency, pp. 186-188, 191-199.

¹² See E.O. 8875, 3 C.F.R., 1938-1943 Comp., pp. 993-995.

¹³ Williams, The Rise of the Vice Presidency, p. 188.

¹⁴ Ibid., p. 190.

¹⁵ See Donald H. Riddle, The Truman Committee: A Study in Congressional Responsibility (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1964).

¹⁶ Truman's Senate committee investigators had come upon evidence of the so-called Manhattan Project for developing the atomic bomb, but when he confronted the Secretary of
(continued...)

Alben W. Barkley

Seven years older than President Truman, Alben Barkley practiced law in his native Kentucky, serving both as a county prosecutor and judge for a few years prior to being elected to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he served from 1913 through the early months of 1927. He successfully ran for the Senate in 1926, and remained in that institution until being sworn in as Vice President on January 20, 1949. During his Senate tenure, Barkley was the Democratic majority leader during 1937-1947 and minority leader in 1947-1948. After his vice presidential service, he was again elected to the Senate in 1954, serving there until his death in April 1956.

In the Senate, Barkley had admired Truman, instinctively, because he “voted right.”¹⁷ That admiration did not dim when FDR selected Truman as his running mate in 1944, a position Barkley himself sought. Actually, it was the President Roosevelt’s maneuvering that angered Barkley, despite his selection to nominate FDR as the party’s presidential candidate.¹⁸ Four years later, Barkley arrived at the position he had sought. Although, by one estimate, “his term of office saw little significant activity,” he did “provide a useful link to Congress at times.”¹⁹ Barkley also regularly attended and participated in Cabinet deliberations; became the first Vice President to sit on the National Security Council,²⁰ which was “considered the most meaningful advance in the vice presidency until that time;”²¹ and once flew to the front lines in Korea to eat Thanksgiving dinner with American troops.²² Moreover, he “represented Truman at all sorts of political meetings, community events and other occasions throughout the United States and abroad.”²³ Indeed, he thought well enough of Barkley that, despite some misgivings regarding the Vice President’s age, Truman was prepared to endorse him as the party’s presidential candidate in 1952.²⁴

¹⁶(...continued)

War with their findings, he was strongly advised to drop his inquiry, which he did. See Theodore Wilson, “The Truman Committee,” in Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Roger Bruns, eds., Congress Investigates: A Documented History, 1792-1974, vol. 4 (New York: Chelsea House, 1975), pp. 3134-3135.

¹⁷ David McCullough, Truman (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992), pp. 220, 226.

¹⁸ Ibid., p. 313.

¹⁹ Joel K. Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1982), p. 137.

²⁰ See 63 Stat. 578, adding the Vice President to the statutorily specified members of the National Security Council.

²¹ Dorman, The Second Man, p. 193.

²² Ibid., pp. 193-194; Williams, The Rise of the Vice Presidency, p. 233.

²³ Dorman, The Second Man, p. 194.

²⁴ Harry S. Truman, Years of Trial and Hope (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1956), p. 495.

Richard M. Nixon

The man who did receive the Democratic presidential nomination in 1952 was Adlai E. Stevenson, Jr., not Alben Barkley. He was overwhelmed in the subsequent election by the very popular Dwight D. Eisenhower, who had Richard M. Nixon as his running mate. Trained as an attorney, Nixon had practiced law for a few years, worked briefly for the Office for Emergency Management in Washington, DC, and then entered naval service during World War II. Returning to civilian life in 1946, Nixon successfully ran for the House of Representatives, serving there from 1947 through 1950. Successfully elected to the Senate in November 1950, he took his seat early, the following month, with an appointment to fill a vacancy. He left the Senate on January 20, 1953, to begin serving as Vice President.

By one estimate, Nixon “exercised greater power and responsibility in the 1953-57 term than had any of his predecessors” as Vice President.²⁵ An active presidential liaison with Congress and presidential representative in Republican political campaigns, he also served Eisenhower as a special envoy, undertaking seven such missions, during which he visited 54 countries.²⁶

Nixon also filled some important institutional roles. He attended 163 Cabinet meetings, 19 of which, in accordance with President Eisenhower’s instructions, he chaired; and of the 217 National Security Council sessions at which he was present, Nixon presided over 26 of these gatherings.²⁷ Other duties included chairing the Government Contract Committee. Establishing by the President with E.O. 10479 of August 13, 1953, the panel was mandated to enforce antidiscrimination clauses in government contracts with private businesses.²⁸ Reporting in early 1955, the committee indicated it had secured compliance in 37 of 79 cases and continued its efforts during the years of Eisenhower’s presidency until it was superseded by the President’s Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity in 1961.²⁹ Early in 1959, when Eisenhower created the Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth to recommend policies to control inflation, he made Nixon the panel’s chairman.³⁰

Lyndon B. Johnson

Although Nixon sought to succeed President Eisenhower, he narrowly lost the 1960 election to John F. Kennedy, who had selected Lyndon B. Johnson as his ²⁵ Williams, The Rise of the Vice Presidency, p. 235.

²⁶ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 159.

²⁷ Ibid., p. 168.

²⁸ 3 C.F.R., 1949-1953 Comp., pp. 961-962.

²⁹ Williams, The Rise of the Vice Presidency, p. 248; 3 C.F.R., 1959-1963 Comp., pp. 448-454.

³⁰ U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1959 (Washington: GPO, 1961), p. 485.

running mate. LBJ had begun his public service career in 1932 as a secretary to a member of the U.S. House of Representatives, then became director of the National Youth Administration for Texas in 1935, prior to being selected in 1937 to fill a House vacancy. Reelected to the House five times, he saw active duty in the Navy during 1941-1942, and, after an unsuccessful campaign in 1941, was elected to the Senate in 1948. Becoming the Democratic leader in 1953, he was reelected to the Senate in 1954 and 1960, serving as the Senate majority leader from 1955 until he resigned in 1961 to become Vice President.

Johnson regularly attended Cabinet and National Security Council meetings, but apparently did not chair sessions of the former, and President Kennedy convened an executive committee of National Security Council members and other officials rather than holding formal council deliberations. (LBJ was also a member of the committee.) In addition, Johnson served the President as an adviser and a liaison to Congress. As a special envoy, he made 10 trips during which he visited a total of 23 countries.³¹

While giving Johnson various institutional roles, Kennedy also assigned his Vice President office space in the Executive Office Building next to the White House.³² For the first time, the Vice President had an executive office in addition to, and apart from, his Senate facilities on Capitol Hill.³³ Creating the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, the 1961 successor to Eisenhower's Government Contract Committee, Kennedy made Johnson its chairman.³⁴ The President also named Johnson to head the National Aeronautics and Space Council,³⁵ an entity within the Executive Office of the President,³⁶ and to lead the Peace Corps National Advisory Council.³⁷

Hubert H. Humphrey

The November 1963 assassination of President Kennedy elevated Johnson to the presidency, and the nation was without a Vice President until 1965, when LBJ, elected in a landslide, was joined by Hubert H. Humphrey. A former mayor of Minneapolis, Humphrey was initially elected to the Senate in 1948, and was returned ³¹ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 159.

³² This development launched the institutionalization of the Vice President's executive office, which is reviewed in Appendix 2 of this report.

³³ Paul C. Light, Vice-Presidential Power (Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984), p. 68.

³⁴ See E.O. 10925, 3 C.F.R., 1959-1963 Comp., pp. 448-454.

³⁵ U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: John F. Kennedy, 1961 (Washington: GPO, 1962), p. 309.

³⁶ As originally chartered in 1958 (72 Stat. 427), the council was chaired by the President, but, at Kennedy's request, Congress assigned the panel's leadership position to the Vice President in 1961 (75 Stat. 46).

³⁷ Dorman, The Second Man, pp. 254-255.

in each of his successive election campaigns. Johnson reportedly was eager to have his assistance, and, by one estimate, no previous Vice President “was used by his President in such a broad variety of roles.”³⁸ However, it has also been observed that “Johnson showed little interest in his own Vice President,” and Humphrey’s willingness to assume so many roles was not merely a result of his energy and enthusiasm, but was more an antidote to his “increasing isolation from policy”—an estrangement attributable, in large measure, to Humphrey’s desires to deescalate U.S. military involvement in Vietnam and to negotiate a settlement of the hostilities in that region.³⁹

Like his immediate predecessors, Humphrey attended Cabinet meetings and National Security Council sessions, but probably did not perform the same liaison to Congress as Johnson had for Kennedy. As a special envoy, he took 12 trips to a total of 31 countries.⁴⁰ He chaired the National Aeronautics and Space Council and the Peace Corps National Advisory Council, but the President’s Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was abolished, and its responsibilities were assigned to the Civil Service Commission and the Department of Labor.⁴¹ Humphrey headed a related, short-lived coordination and policy-recommending panel, the President’s Council on Equal Opportunity,⁴² and Congress created another statutory leadership role for him by assigning the Vice President the chairmanship of the new National Council on Marine Resources and Engineering Development.⁴³ In the spring of 1967, LBJ began assigning the Vice President responsibility for chairing various presidential policy-planning and coordinating panels, including the President’s Council on Youth Opportunity,⁴⁴ the President’s Council on Physical Fitness and Sports,⁴⁵ the National Council on Indian Opportunity,⁴⁶ and the President’s Council on Recreation and Natural Beauty.⁴⁷

Spiro T. Agnew

When Johnson declined to seek his party’s presidential nomination in 1968, Humphrey became the standard-bearer, but was defeated by Richard M. Nixon, whose running mate, Spiro T. Agnew, became Vice President. An attorney and ³⁸ Ibid., p. 274.

³⁹ Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 32; also see Hubert H. Humphrey, The Education of a Public Man (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1976), pp. 314-353, 355-359.

⁴⁰ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 159.

⁴¹ See E.O. 11246, 3 C.F.R., 1964-1965 Comp., pp. 339-348; Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 155.

⁴² See E.O. 11197, 3 C.F.R. 1964-1965 Comp., pp. 278-280.

⁴³ See 80 Stat. 204.

⁴⁴ See E.O. 11330, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 622-624.

⁴⁵ See E.O. 11398, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 714-716.

⁴⁶ See E.O. 11399, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., p. 717.

⁴⁷ See E.O. 11402, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., p. 719.

county government official, Agnew had been elected governor of Maryland in 1966. As Vice President, he began presiding over the deliberations of the Senate with no prior legislative experience, and he apparently devoted little of his time to this responsibility.⁴⁸ Agnew was also ill-prepared for congressional liaison duties on behalf of the President, but he did undertake special envoy assignments, making seven trips to a total of 28 countries.⁴⁹

Agnew met with the Cabinet and the National Security Council, but other leadership roles were eliminated or never offered. The National Council on Marine Resources and Engineering Development became dormant and was eventually terminated in June 1971.⁵⁰ Nixon eliminated the President's Council on Recreation and Natural Beauty,⁵¹ and reconstituted the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports with the President's consultant on physical fitness as the chair.⁵² Other such panels apparently did not interest the Vice President. According to one account, "Agnew was not an activist Vice-President and did not want many assignments," two exceptions being the National Aeronautics and Space Council, which was subsequently abolished by presidential reorganization plan in 1973,⁵³ and the new Office of Intergovernmental Relations, but he "had trouble with both."⁵⁴ Established less than a month after the inauguration as an Executive Office agency, the Office of Intergovernmental Relations was placed under the immediate supervision of the Vice President and was created to make use of Agnew's experience in state and local government matters.⁵⁵ Nixon's displeasure with the Vice President's performance prompted him to remove Agnew from intergovernmental affairs following the 1972 elections, and the Office of Intergovernmental Relations was abolished.⁵⁶

The Vice President was made a member, but not the chair or the head, of some other presidential entities, such as the Council for Urban Affairs,⁵⁷ the Cabinet

⁴⁸ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 142; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 43.

⁴⁹ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 159; see also pp. 160, 166.

⁵⁰ See 84 Stat. 865.

⁵¹ See E.O. 11472, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 792-795.

⁵² See E.O. 11562, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 970-972.

⁵³ See 87 Stat. 1089.

⁵⁴ Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 33.

⁵⁵ See E.O. 11455, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 775-777.

⁵⁶ See Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 33; E.O. 11690, 3 C.F.R., 1971-1975 Comp., pp. 732-734.

⁵⁷ See E.O. 11452, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 772-773.

Committee on Economic Policy,⁵⁸ the Environmental Quality Council,⁵⁹ the Council for Rural Affairs,⁶⁰ and the Domestic Council.⁶¹

There is evidence that the President and some of his senior assistants became sufficiently disappointed with Agnew's performance during Nixon's first term that he was almost replaced by former Texas governor John B. Connally as the Republican vice presidential nominee for the 1972 campaign.⁶² Agnew, however, was retained by Nixon and was reelected with him. Then, seven months after the inauguration, Agnew received notice that he was under investigation by the U.S. attorney for Maryland concerning alleged kickbacks from private architectural and engineering firms that had been improperly awarded state and federal contracts during Agnew's county executive, gubernatorial, and vice presidential years. The investigation continued, and, after other efforts to contend with the multiple charges against him failed, Agnew agreed to resign and avoid imprisonment by pleading no contest to a single charge of federal income tax evasion. His resignation occurred on October 10, 1973.

Gerald R. Ford

Under the terms of the 25th Amendment, Gerald R. Ford, a member of the House of Representatives since 1949 and House minority leader since 1965, was nominated by President Nixon on October 12, 1973, to succeed Agnew as Vice President. Ford was subsequently confirmed by the Senate on November 27 and by the House on December 6. He resigned from the House the same day his colleagues approved his nomination, and was sworn in as Vice President.

As Ford began his new duties, revelations about the so-called Watergate incident—the June 17, 1972, burglary at the Democratic National Committee headquarters located in the Watergate office building in Washington, DC—had already captured public attention. Five men had been arrested and were subsequently brought to trial in January 1973. Revelations about the larger implications of the break-in had been appearing in the Washington Post, which, in early October 1972, had charged that “the Watergate bugging incident stemmed from a massive campaign of political spying and sabotage conducted on behalf of President Nixon's re-election.”⁶³ Subsequently, investigations by a Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, the House Committee on the Judiciary, and federal prosecutors revealed the truth of this allegation.

⁵⁸ See E.O. 11453, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 773-774.

⁵⁹ See E.O. 11472, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 792-795.

⁶⁰ See E.O. 11493, 3 C.F.R., 1966-1970 Comp., pp. 876-877.

⁶¹ See 84 Stat. 2085.

⁶² See Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 171; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 33, 46, 107.

⁶³ Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward, “FBI Finds Nixon Aides Sabotaged Democrats,” Washington Post, Oct. 10, 1972, pp. A1, A14.

Ford warily observed these unfolding disclosures as he moved from the House to the vice presidency. Remaining largely “aloof from the executive branch” as Vice President,⁶⁴ he did chair the newly established Domestic Council Committee on the Right of Privacy,⁶⁵ which, among other pursuits, assisted with the development of the Privacy Act of 1974.⁶⁶ As the investigations of the Watergate incident and related matters continued, Ford “spent little time in Washington as Vice President and rarely interceded with Congress” on behalf of the President.⁶⁷

On May 9, 1974, in closed session, members of the House Committee on the Judiciary began considering the evidence concerning the President’s possible involvement in the Watergate break-in and cover-up. At the end of the month, the Supreme Court agreed to hear arguments on President Nixon’s claim of executive privilege to withhold evidence subpoenaed by Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski for use in a Watergate-related trial. On the morning of July 24, a unanimous Court upheld Jaworski’s subpoena to President Nixon.⁶⁸ That evening, the Committee on the Judiciary, in open session, began its discussion of the impeachment of the President. Six days later, the panel approved three articles of impeachment, recommending to the House that the President be impeached and removed from office for violating his constitutional oath by obstruction of justice in the Watergate cover-up, by abuse of his presidential powers in various ways, and by contempt of Congress in refusing to comply with the committee’s subpoena.⁶⁹

Conceding that the disclosure “may further damage my case,” Nixon, on August 8, released the transcripts of three conversations that he had held with White House chief of staff H.R. Haldeman on June 23, 1972, shortly after the Watergate burglary.⁷⁰ Congressional support for the President almost disappeared with the revelation of these conversations. After meeting with congressional leaders on August 7 and 8, 1974, Nixon announced in a broadcast address to the nation on the evening of the second day that he was resigning from office, saying, “it has become evident to me that I no longer have a strong enough political base in the Congress to justify ⁶⁴ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 156.

⁶⁵ The committee was established by presidential announcement on Feb. 23, 1974; see Office of the White House Press Secretary, “Fact Sheet: The President’s Address on the American Right of Privacy,” Washington, DC, Feb. 23, 1974 (copy in author’s possession).

⁶⁶ Ironically, by the time Congress cleared the Privacy Act for presidential approval, Ford had succeeded to the presidency and he signed the measure; see 88 Stat. 1896.

⁶⁷ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 180.

⁶⁸ United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974).

⁶⁹ See U.S. Congress, House Committee on the Judiciary, Impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, 93rd Cong., 2nd sess., H.Rept. 93-1305 (Washington: GPO, 1974).

⁷⁰ U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States, Richard Nixon, 1974 (Washington: GPO, 1975), pp. 621-623.

continuing [the] effort” to withstand impeachment and stay in office.⁷¹ The following day, his letter of resignation reached the Secretary of State shortly after 11:30 a.m. and was accepted.⁷² Vice President Ford succeeded to the presidency.

Nelson A. Rockefeller

Pursuant to the terms of the 25th Amendment, President Ford nominated Nelson A. Rockefeller to be Vice President on August 20, 1974. The Senate confirmed the selection on December 10, and the House followed, giving its approval on December 19 and clearing the way for the administration of the oath of office in the Senate chamber and that same day. Rockefeller had begun government service in 1940 as the head of the Office for Coordination of Commercial and Cultural Relations between the American Republics, which later became the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs in 1941. He left the leadership of this latter entity in 1944 to become assistant secretary of state for American republics affairs, serving until August 1945. Rockefeller returned to the federal government in 1950, serving as the chairman of President Truman’s International Development Advisory Board, which reviewed the U.S. “Point four” program for technical assistance abroad. Subsequently, in 1953, President Eisenhower appointed him chairman of the President’s Advisory Committee on Government Organization, a position he held until 1958. In addition, Rockefeller was made undersecretary of health, education, and welfare in 1953, then moved to the White House in 1954 to be a special assistant to President Eisenhower. He was initially elected governor of New York in 1959 and, with successive reelections, served through 1973. Rockefeller also was President Nixon’s personal representative to Latin America in 1969, and he served on the President’s Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board during 1969-1974.

Rockefeller came to the vice presidency eager to assist the President, and the formulation of domestic policy was a major area of interest to him. He began as “an active participant” in the Ford Administration, but quickly “was frozen out of the policy process” for several reasons, most of which concerned his assumption of institutional roles.⁷³ Shortly after his confirmation as Vice President, Rockefeller sought to be the de facto head of the Domestic Council and, thereby, serve as the primary conduit of domestic policy proposals to the President. Ford initially agreed to this arrangement, then had second thoughts after conferring with some senior White House assistants, but was finally swayed by Rockefeller. The incident, however, won Rockefeller the enmity of some important White House aides, including ⁷¹ Ibid., pp. 626-629.

⁷² Ibid., p. 633.

⁷³ See Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 180.

chief of staff Donald Rumsfeld.⁷⁴ Moreover, Rockefeller was not an active or effective promoter of administration policies with Congress.⁷⁵

Rockefeller also accepted assignments involving significant commitments of time, energy, and political capital, which not only subjected him to bureaucratic conflicts, but also further involved him in policy disputes with White House assistants and senior administration officials. Primary among these was his leadership of the Domestic Council and his chairmanship of the Commission on CIA Activities within the United States.⁷⁶ In addition, Rockefeller headed such panels as the National Commission on Productivity and Work Quality,⁷⁷ the President's Panel on Federal Compensation,⁷⁸ and the National Study Commission on Water Quality.⁷⁹ He was a member, as well, of the Commission on the Organization of the Government for the Conduct of Foreign Policy.⁸⁰

Walter F. Mondale

Although Rockefeller was not Ford's running mate in the 1976 election campaign, the contest was won by the opposition, bringing Jimmy Carter to the presidency and Walter F. Mondale to the vice presidency. A practicing attorney and former Minnesota attorney general, Mondale had been appointed to fill the Senate seat of Hubert H. Humphrey, who had resigned in 1964 preparatory to becoming Vice President. Mondale had remained in the Senate, being elected in 1966 and returned in 1972.

At Carter's insistence, Mondale was given an office in the West Wing of the White House, in close proximity to the Oval Office.⁸¹ (Agnew was the first Vice President to occupy space there, but, isolated from his own staff and pressured by the White House chief of staff, moved out after a brief stay.) Furthermore, immediately after the election, the two men had agreed that Mondale would not be burdened with various secondary roles, but, in the President's words, "would truly be second in ⁷⁴ See Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, pp. 171-172; Robert T. Hartmann, Palace Politics (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1980), pp. 304-311, 354-359; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 183-184, 187-192.

⁷⁵ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 180.

⁷⁶ For the commission's mandate, see E.O. 11828, 3 C.F.R., 1971-1975 Comp., pp. 933-934; also see Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 184-187.

⁷⁷ See 85 Stat. 753; 88 Stat. 236.

⁷⁸ See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Gerald R. Ford, 1975 (Washington: GPO, 1977), p. 813.

⁷⁹ See 86 Stat. 875.

⁸⁰ See 86 Stat. 497.

⁸¹ Jimmy Carter, Keeping Faith (New York: Bantam, 1982), p. 40; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 76-77.

command, involved in every aspect of governing.”⁸² The vitiation of the vice presidency as a legislative position was now, if not before, complete: executive duties were the priority of the office. Indeed, during his first year as Vice President, Mondale devoted a total of only 18 hours to presiding over the Senate.⁸³

Mondale made 14 trips to a total of 35 countries, often functioning as a presidential policy agent.⁸⁴ He functioned as the President’s “general adviser,” being, in Carter’s view, “the only person that I have, with both the substantive knowledge and political stature to whom I can turn over a major assignment.”⁸⁵ Furthermore, the Vice President’s role was enhanced by the respect accorded him and his staff by the President’s senior assistants, by the “impressive and dignified assignments” given to him by the President amid “conditions under which Mondale could be an effective counselor,” by complete information sharing, and by structured meetings with the President as well as the right to participate in any conference unless asked to leave.⁸⁶ He also proved valuable concerning White House relations with Congress—initially, in acquainting senior presidential aides with congressional structure, operations, and culture, and also in providing some Members of Congress a trustworthy conduit to the President.⁸⁷

George H. W. Bush

The unsuccessful reelection effort of Carter and Mondale in 1980 brought Ronald Reagan to the presidency, with George H. W. Bush as his Vice President. An experienced public servant, Bush had been a two-term member of the House of Representatives; ambassador to the United Nations and Republican National Committee chairman during the Nixon Administration; U.S. diplomatic representative to the People’s Republic of China and Director of Central Intelligence during the Ford Administration; and a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 1980.

Reagan scarcely knew Bush before agreeing to his selection, almost as an afterthought, as an acceptable running mate who would never become a confidant to the President.⁸⁸ However, even though the two men were not very well acquainted with each other, Bush was “intensely loyal” to Reagan and remained in his shadow.⁸⁹

⁸² Carter, Keeping Faith, p. 39; also see Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 157; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 47-48, 206-208.

⁸³ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, p. 142.

⁸⁴ See Ibid., pp. 159, 161-162, 166.

⁸⁵ See Ibid., pp. 172-173; also see Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 201-202.

⁸⁶ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, pp. 150, 173-174, 221; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 208-212, 218-220.

⁸⁷ Goldstein, The Modern American Vice Presidency, pp. 180-181.

⁸⁸ Bob Schieffer and Gary Paul Gates, The Acting President (New York: E.P. Dutton, 1989), p. 313.

⁸⁹ Ibid., p. 318.

For his part, Reagan “came to enjoy Bush’s company around the office,” but the two men and their wives did not socialize.⁹⁰

Bush retained Mondale’s West Wing office, had at least weekly private meetings with the President, and enjoyed the added benefit of having his old friend and 1980 campaign manager, James Baker III, serving as White House chief of staff. He was also more willing than Mondale had been to take on various secondary roles.⁹¹ Bush was made a member of each of the five initial Cabinet councils formed at the outset of the Reagan Administration,⁹² and also served on the subsequently created Economic Policy Council and Domestic Policy Council.⁹³ He also was made the chairman of the Presidential Task Force on Regulatory Relief,⁹⁴ the National Security Council’s crisis management team,⁹⁵ the South Florida Task Force on Drug Abuse and Trafficking Prevention,⁹⁶ an interagency action group on mitigating economic hardship in the southwest border region,⁹⁷ and the Vice President’s Task Force on Combating Terrorism.⁹⁸

Bush apparently retained the influential presidential advisory role established by Mondale, but it was by no means a guaranteed status for future successors. Such ⁹⁰ Ibid.; also see Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 266.

⁹¹ Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 260-261, 264.

⁹² See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Ronald Reagan, 1981 (Washington: GPO, 1982), pp. 166-167; on the work of the Cabinet councils, see Chester A. Newland, “Executive Office Policy Apparatus: Enforcing the Reagan Agenda,” in Lester M. Salamon and Michael S. Lund, eds., The Reagan Presidency and the Governing of America (Washington: Urban Institute, 1985), pp. 153-161; James P. Pfiffner, The Strategic Presidency (Chicago, IL: Dorsey, 1988), pp. 58-67.

⁹³ See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Ronald Reagan, 1985 (Washington: GPO, 1988), p. 419.

⁹⁴ See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Ronald Reagan, 1981, pp. 30-31; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 261.

⁹⁵ See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Ronald Reagan, 1981, p. 285; Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 261-262.

⁹⁶ See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Ronald Reagan, 1982 (Washington: GPO, 1983), pp. 1252, 1314, 1488-1491.

⁹⁷ See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Ronald Reagan, 1983 (Washington: GPO, 1985), p. 1160.

⁹⁸ See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Ronald Reagan, 1985, p. 800.

influence, it has been observed, “remains conditioned by factors that evolve with each new administration.”⁹⁹

Danforth Quayle

Elected to the presidency in 1988, Bush was joined by Dan Quayle as Vice President. After working briefly as a journalist and Indiana state government official, Quayle was elected in 1976 to the House of Representatives, where he served until being elected to the Senate in 1980. Returned to the Senate in 1986, he was Bush’s surprise choice as his running mate in 1988. The two men apparently had come to know each other when the young Senator began to stop by Bush’s Capitol Hill office to chat, but they were not particularly close or well acquainted.¹⁰⁰ On the eve of the opening of the Republican national convention, when Bush met with several major senior campaign advisers to discuss the vice presidential candidate, Quayle was one of seven top choices to be named as a possible running mate—“the one most often proposed by this knowledgeable circle of political pros.”¹⁰¹ His subsequent selection stunned many, and some considered it an impulsive decision by Bush.¹⁰² When he invited him to join the ticket, Bush reportedly told Quayle that he was “the first choice, and my only choice.”¹⁰³ After the election, Bush offered some plausible reasons for his decision, but the strong likelihood of Quayle’s giving unswerving loyalty to the President probably was a crucially persuasive factor.¹⁰⁴

Quayle retained a West Wing office, “only a few feet away from the Oval Office,” and had a routine weekly luncheon meeting with the President.¹⁰⁵ He also regularly attended Cabinet and National Security Council meetings. Quayle’s other institutional roles included chairing a task force that came to be known as the Council on Competitiveness.¹⁰⁶ An extension of the Presidential Task Force on Regulatory Relief, which Bush had led during his vice presidential tenure, the new panel soon became immersed in controversy concerning its alleged secrecy, interference in various aspects of regulatory policy and practice, and transgressions of ethics

⁹⁹ Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 268.

¹⁰⁰ Jack W. Germond and Jules Witcover, Whose Broad Stripes and Bright Stars? (New York: Warner, 1989), p. 374.

¹⁰¹ Ibid., p. 379.

¹⁰² Burt A. Rockman, “The Leadership Style of George Bush,” in Colin Campbell and Bert A. Rockman, eds., The Bush Presidency: First Appraisals (Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1991), p. 30.

¹⁰³ Germond and Witcover, Whose Broad Stripes and Bright Stars?, p. 385.

¹⁰⁴ See Ibid., p. 387

¹⁰⁵ Dan Quayle, Standing Firm (New York: HarperCollins, 1994), pp. 86, 103-107.

¹⁰⁶ See U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: George Bush, 1989 (Washington: GPO, 1990), pp. 76, 86; U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: George Bush, 1990 (Washington: GPO, 1991), pp. 333, 833, 1094-1095.

standards.¹⁰⁷ Quayle also was active as the chairman of the National Space Council,¹⁰⁸ which provided advice and assistance to the President on national space policy and strategy.¹⁰⁹

As Bush committed American armed forces to combat in the Persian Gulf region in early 1991, Quayle's meetings with the President became more frequent, but his influence as an adviser in this area was not immediately clear.¹¹⁰ During the prosecution of the Gulf War, Bush, by one assessment, "seemed increasingly mature and self-assured," while Quayle "seemed to some as commensurately less so."¹¹¹ Bush retained Quayle as his running mate in 1992, but their reelection effort proved unsuccessful.

Albert Gore, Jr.

The 1992 elections brought William J. Clinton to the presidency, and with him, Albert Gore, Jr., as Vice President. The son of a U.S. Senator, Gore arrived at the vice presidency after having served four terms in the House of Representatives and one term in the Senate. After mounting an unsuccessful bid to obtain the Democratic presidential nomination in 1988, Gore had been reelected to the Senate in 1990. He continued as Vice President during President Clinton's second term of office.

Beyond his participation in Cabinet and National Security Council meetings, Gore quickly became and remained one of the President's "most influential ¹⁰⁷ In chronological order, see, for example, Christine Triano, "Quayle and Co.," Government Information Insider, vol. 1, June 1991, pp. 6-8; Ann Devroy and David S. Broder, "Quayle Pressured Agencies to Ease Rules on Business, Groups Say," Washington Post, Sept. 8, 1991, p. A6; David S. Broder and Stan Hinden, "Quayle Requests Look at Breeden Testimony," Washington Post, Oct. 2, 1991, pp. C1, C3; "Still Meddling After All These Months," The OMB Watcher, vol. 9, Oct. 30, 1991, pp. 8-11; Dana Priest, "Competitiveness Council Suspected of Unduly Influencing Regulators," Washington Post, Nov. 18, 1991, p. A19; Michael Weisskopf, "Regulatory Adviser Has Stake in Chemical Firm," Washington Post, Nov. 20, 1991, p. A21; Dana Priest, "Competitiveness Council Under Scrutiny," Washington Post, Nov. 26, 1991, p. A19; Michael Weisskopf, "Quayle Council Official Had Role in Acid Rain Rule Action," Washington Post, Dec. 6, 1991, p. A3; Michael Weisskopf, "White House Defends Competitiveness Chief," Washington Post, Dec. 10, 1991, p. A19; "Conflict on the Quayle Council," The OMB Watcher, vol. 9, Dec. 24, 1991, pp. 7-9; Christine Triano, "Dan's World," Government Information Insider, vol. 2, March 1992, pp. 2-3; "The Council on Competitiveness: Executive Oversight of Agency Rulemaking," Administrative Law Journal of the American University, vol. 7, Summer 1993, pp. 297-343; Charles Tiefer, The Semi-Sovereign Presidency (Boulder, CO: Westview, 1994), pp. 61-88.

¹⁰⁸ See 102 Stat. 4102.

¹⁰⁹ See U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: George Bush, 1989, pp. 456-457; David C. Morrison, "Vice President for Space," National Journal, vol. 21, July 29, 1989, pp. 1910-1915.

¹¹⁰ See Paul G. Kengor, "The Role of the Vice President During the Crisis in the Persian Gulf," Presidential Studies Quarterly, vol. 24, Fall 1994, pp. 783-807.

¹¹¹ Burt Solomon, "War Bolsters Quayle's Visibility ... But Hasn't Increased His Stature," National Journal, vol. 23, Mar. 2, 1991, pp. 522-523.

advisers.”¹¹² One of the first special duties Clinton assigned his Vice President began shortly after the inauguration. On March 3, 1993, the President indicated he was initiating a National Performance Review (NPR) to be conducted by a task force headed by Gore. The goal, said Clinton, “is to make the entire Federal Government both less expensive and more efficient, and to change the culture of our national bureaucracy away from complacency and entitlement toward initiative and empowerment. We intend to redesign, to reinvent, to reinvigorate the entire National Government.”¹¹³ Gore led the NPR—which went through various phases and resulted in a multiplicity of assessments, initiatives, and reforms—to the final days of the Clinton Administration.¹¹⁴

During June and July, the Vice President, at the President’s direction, worked with the relevant departments and agencies to identify problems and recommend solutions regarding border management and immigration policy.¹¹⁵ Later, Gore represented the administration in a highly publicized November 1993 broadcast debate with former independent presidential candidate H. Ross Perot, supporting congressional approval of the North American Free Trade Agreement.¹¹⁶ He also was designated by Clinton to lead a U.S. Russian Joint Commission on Energy and Space¹¹⁷ and to chair the President’s Community Enterprise Board, which was created to provide advice and coordination regarding various federal programs available to distressed communities.¹¹⁸

In the early years of his vice presidency, Gore, in the words of the President, “led the charge to make this administration a leader in the global environmental effort,” and he continued to exert such leadership during his tenure.¹¹⁹ At Clinton’s direction, Gore established a working group on Indian economic development in 1994, in conjunction with the administration’s community enterprise initiatives.¹²⁰ During the year, the President also named Gore to lead a U.S.-Russian Joint Commission on ¹¹² Elizabeth Drew, Showdown (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1996), p. 224.

¹¹³ U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: William J. Clinton, 1993 (Washington: GPO, 1994), pp. 233-235, 1944-1948.

¹¹⁴ See U.S. Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, The National Performance Review and Other Government Reform Initiatives: An Overview, 1993-1999, by Harold C. Relyea, Maricele J. Cornejo Riemann, and Henry B. Hogue, CRS Report RL30596 (Washington: June 14, 2000).

¹¹⁵ See U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: William J. Clinton, 1993, pp. 1194-1196.

¹¹⁶ Ibid., pp. 1905, 1940-1941, 1944-1945.

¹¹⁷ Ibid., pp. 1429, 1448.

¹¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 1460-1462.

¹¹⁹ U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: William J. Clinton, 1994 (Washington: GPO, 1995), p. 742.

¹²⁰ Ibid., p. 802.

Economic and Technological Cooperation¹²¹ and the Ounce of Prevention Council, which was charged with overseeing and coordinating the various crime prevention programs governed by the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994.¹²²

The Vice President also assumed a major role regarding telecommunications and electronic information infrastructure policy and development,¹²³ aviation safety and security matters,¹²⁴ and electronic commerce strategy.¹²⁵ Gore's eight-year record of performance as Vice President awaits thorough scholarly analysis. The popular assessment of the man who sought to succeed President Clinton was seemingly favorable, though close, in the 2000 election, but he lost the electoral vote contest.

Richard B. Cheney

Selected by Texas Governor George W. Bush to be his running mate, Richard B. Cheney comes to the vice presidency with a varied public service background. Gaining staff experience in a gubernatorial and congressional office before becoming a special assistant to the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity during 1969-1970, Cheney subsequently served as a White House staff assistant in 1971, assistant director of the Cost of Living Council during 1971-1973, deputy assistant to the President during 1973-1975, and White House chief of staff during 1975-1976. Elected to the House of Representatives in 1978, he served there until 1989, when he was appointed Secretary of Defense during the Bush Administration. Returning to private life in 1992, Cheney became an oil industry, construction, and insurance company executive.

Having ruled out seeking the presidency for himself, Cheney reportedly has begun his tenure with an integration of his vice presidential staff with that of the President, allowing the White House to speak and act with leadership unity as it deals with Congress and the public.¹²⁶

Early assignments for Cheney include chairing a study commission on the developing national energy crisis and serving as a liaison to Congress. For this latter role, the Vice President has set up offices in the House as well as the Senate. The President has also asked him to be a principal spokesman for the administration, ¹²¹ Ibid., pp. 1643, 1652, 1660.

¹²² Ibid., pp. 1542-2543.

¹²³ See, for example, U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: William J. Clinton, 1996 (Washington: GPO, 1997), pp. 186-187, 191, 243, 257, 261, 344, 346, 404, 1802.

¹²⁴ Ibid., pp. 1201, 1219, 1259, 1289, 1416, 1506, 1650, 1728, 1750, 1794, 1796, 2193.

¹²⁵ See, for example, U.S. National Archives and Records Administration, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: William J. Clinton, 1998 (Washington: GPO, 2000), pp. 2095, 2101.

¹²⁶ Dana Milbank, "For Number Two, the Future Is Now," Washington Post, Feb. 3, 2001, p. A1.

making himself especially available to the broadcast media. Bush is giving consideration to having Cheney chair the meetings of deputies from the Departments of State and Defense and the National Security Council. The role, heretofore never held by a Vice President, would give Cheney an opportunity to recommend and influence foreign policy.¹²⁷

¹²⁷ Ibid., p. A14.

Appendix 1: Presidents and Vice Presidents of the United States (with years of service)

George Washington (1789-1797)
John Adams (1789-1797)

John Adams (1797-1801)
Thomas Jefferson (1797-1801)

Thomas Jefferson (1801-1809)
Aaron Burr (1801-1805)
George Clinton (1805-1809)

James Madison (1809-1817)
George Clinton (1809-1817)
Elbridge Gerry (1813-1814)

James Monroe (1817-1825)
Daniel D. Tompkins (1817-1825)

John Quincy Adams (1825-1829)
John C. Calhoun (1825-1829)

Andrew Jackson (1829-1837)
John C. Calhoun (1829-1832)
Martin Van Buren (1833-1837)

Martin Van Buren (1837-1841)
Richard M. Johnson (1837-1841)

William Henry Harrison (1841)
John Tyler (1841)

John Tyler (1841-1845)*
vacant (1841-1845)

James K. Polk (1845-1849)
George M. Dallas (1845-1849)

Zachary Taylor (1849-1850)
Millard Fillmore (1849-1850)

Millard Fillmore (1850-1853)*
vacant (1850-1853)

Franklin Pierce (1853-1857)
William R. King (1853-1857)

James Buchanan (1857-1861)
John C. Breckenridge (1857-1861)

Abraham Lincoln (1861-1865)
Hannibal Hamlin (1861-1865)
Andrew Johnson (1865)

Andrew Johnson (1865-1869)*
vacant (1865-1869)

Ulysses S. Grant (1869-1877)
Schuyler Colfax (1869-1873)
Henry Wilson (1873-1875)

Rutherford B. Hayes (1877-1881)
William B. Wheeler (1877-1881)

James A. Garfield (1881)
Chester A. Arthur (1881)

Chester A. Arthur (1881-1885)*
vacant (1881-1885)

Grover Cleveland (1885-1889; 1893-1897)
Thomas A. Hendricks (1885-1889)
Adlai E. Stevenson (1893-1897)

Benjamin Harrison (1889-1893)
Levi P. Morton (1889-1893)

William McKinley (1897-1901)
Garret A. Hobart (1897-1901)
Theodore Roosevelt (1901)

Theodore Roosevelt (1901-1909)*
vacant (1901-1905)
Charles W. Fairbanks (1905-1909)

William H. Taft (1909-1913)
James S. Sherman (1909-1913)

Woodrow Wilson (1913-1921)
Thomas R. Marshall (1913-1921)

Warren G. Harding (1921-1923)
Calvin Coolidge (1921-1923)

Calvin Coolidge (1923-1929)*
vacant (1923-1925)
Charles G. Dawes (1925-1929)

Herbert C. Hoover (1929-1933)
Charles Curtis (1929-1933)

Franklin D. Roosevelt (1933-1945)
John N. Garner (1933-1941)
Henry A. Wallace (1941-1945)
Harry S. Truman (1945)

Harry S. Truman (1945-1953)*
vacant (1945-1949)
Alben W. Barkley (1949-1953)

Dwight D. Eisenhower (1953-1961)
Richard M. Nixon (1953-1961)

John F. Kennedy (1961-1963)
Lyndon B. Johnson (1961-1963)

Lyndon B. Johnson (1963-1969)*
vacant (1963-1965)
Hubert H. Humphrey (1965-1969)

Richard M. Nixon (1969-1974)
Spiro T. Agnew (1969-1973)
Gerald R. Ford (1973-1974)

Gerald R. Ford (1974-1977)*
Nelson A. Rockefeller (1974-1977)

Jimmy Carter (1977-1981)
Walter Mondale (1977-1981)

Ronald Reagan (1981-1989)
George H. W. Bush (1981-1989)

George H. W. Bush (1989-1993)
Danforth Quayle (1989-1993)

William J. Clinton (1993-2001)
Albert Gore, Jr. (1993-2001)

George W. Bush (2001-)
Richard Cheney (2001-)

* Indicates succession from the vice presidency to the presidency pursuant to constitutional process.

Appendix 2: Institutionalization of the Vice President's Executive Office

As the presiding officer of the Senate, the Vice President has long maintained offices on Capitol Hill. Currently, the Vice President has a ceremonial office in the Capitol and a working office in the Dirksen Office Building.

The institutionalization of the Vice President's executive office began in 1961, when space was provided for the Vice President and his staff in what was then known as the Executive Office Building situated adjacent to the White House.¹²⁸ In 1970, Congress established a federal budget line item for the Vice President's executive office in the form of "Special Assistance to the President," as the account is designated. Appropriations are provided "[f]or expenses necessary to enable the Vice President to provide assistance to the President in connection with specially assigned functions."¹²⁹ The funds, lately amounting to $3-4 million, allowed the Vice President then, as well as today, to hire qualified staff and to acquire and maintain administrative support.¹³⁰ As a consequence, the Vice President not only was relieved from borrowing employees from the departments and agencies to obtain staff assistance, but also was under less compulsion to seek the leadership of temporary study or coordination panels in order to acquire personnel.¹³¹ Soon, staff specialists began to appear, making the Vice President's office a replica, in microcosm, of the President's office. For example, Ford was the first Vice President to have his own national security adviser and his own counsel;¹³² Mondale created his own staff for domestic policy development.¹³³ When a White House staff authorization was legislated in 1978, more detailed vice presidential staff employment structure was established, along with more relaxed arrangements for making expenditures for certain authorized expenses incurred by, or in connection with, assisting the Vice President and requirements concerning reimbursements for, and the reporting of, executive branch employees detailed to the Vice President's office.¹³⁴ ¹²⁸The Executive Office Building, built in five sections between 1871 and 1888, was initially known as the State, War, and Navy Building, as it housed those three departments. In 1939, with the establishment of the Executive Office of the President, two agencies of this new enclave were located in the State, War, and Navy Building. By 1949, Executive Office agencies completely occupied the structure, and it became known as the Executive Office Building. Later, when a second edifice for Executive Office agencies was constructed on 17th Street, just a short distance from the White House, the original building became known as the Old Executive Office Building. In 1999, the structure was statutorily designated the Dwight D. Eisenhower Executive Office Building, in honor of the 34th President (113 Stat. 1309).

¹²⁹See 84 Stat. 76.

¹³⁰Light, Vice-Presidential Power, pp. 69-70, 81-82.

¹³¹See Ibid., pp. 32-33.

¹³²*Ibid.*, pp. 72, 95.

¹³³*Ibid.*, p. 91.

¹³⁴See 92 Stat. 2446-2448, 2449-2450.

The Vice President's executive office was formally recognized for the first time in the pages of the United States Government Organization Manual 1972/73. The entry, appearing at the end of the section profiling units of the Executive Office of the President (EOP), listed the Vice President's senior assistants and briefly described his constitutional, statutory, and presidentially assigned responsibilities.¹³⁵ Amounting to "little more than a symbolic step toward institutionalization," nonetheless, "the listing helped define the boundaries of an executive agency" supporting the President.¹³⁶

During the early months of his tenure, Vice President Ford declined presidential offers of White House staff assistance and began recruiting his own support personnel—a counsel, a national security adviser, speech writers, and administrative aides. He began with a staff of 17, which, with an appropriations increase, grew to 70 by the time he succeeded to the presidency in August 1974. By one estimate, with these developments, "the Vice President's office became an independent source of information and expertise."¹³⁷ Ford's personnel practices also established "the Vice President's freedom to hire and fire the staffs of his choice."¹³⁸

The years of the Ford, Rockefeller, and Mondale vice presidencies also saw more formal organization of their offices. "Instead of loose collections of individuals under Humphrey," comments one close observer, "the Ford and Mondale offices became quite hierarchical, involving specific chains of command and functions." As a result, "this tighter organization allowed for better communication between the Vice President's office and the rest of the EOP."¹³⁹

Finally, the Mondale vice presidency brought some other important developments. The first involved perquisites—the availability of "White House mess privileges, better aircraft, better offices, fast printing support, and limousines"—signaling institutional prestige.¹⁴⁰ There was also an integration of the Vice President's staff into the White House policymaking process.¹⁴¹ Furthermore, Mondale received an office in the West Wing, placing him in close proximity to the Oval Office, to which he was readily welcomed. These developments produced "the rise of an esprit de corps among the Vice President's staff," or, stated another way: "No longer was it the worst moment of a career to work for the Vice President." If nothing else, this new attitude is a reflection of the institutional change that has occurred in the Vice President's executive office, with the result that vice presidential ¹³⁵See U.S. General Services Administration, National Archives and Records Service, Office of the Federal Register, United States Government Organization Manual 1972/73 (Washington: GPO, 1972), p. 89.

¹³⁶Light, Vice-Presidential Power, p. 71.

¹³⁷*Ibid.*, pp. 71-72.

¹³⁸*Ibid.*, p. 73.

¹³⁹*Ibid.*, pp. 73, 79-100.

¹⁴⁰*Ibid.*, p. 74.

¹⁴¹*Ibid.*, pp. 75-76, 209-210.

staff “think of themselves as more valuable members of the presidential establishment.”¹⁴²

<http://wikileaks.org/wiki/CRS-RL30842>

¹⁴²Ibid., p. 77.

